PREFACE

Never has the study of living languages been cultivated with so much ardour and care as at the present time. The development of commercial enterprise, the fruitful rivalry of industrial pursuits, and the prodigious extension of the means of international communication have rendered this study indispensable even to him who is not attracted by the exquisite pleasure of being able to read in the original the works of the poets, the historians, the orators, the philosophers and men of science, who are the honour and glory of our times and of the preceding centuries.

Of all the languages now spoken, the English and Spanish are deservedly among the most generally studied. Not only is the knowledge of these two languages, as much as that of the dead languages, the mark of a complete education, but it is no less a necessity to the tradesman and manufacturer than to the man of science or the politician.

Immense progress has been made during the last few years towards facilitating the reciprocal acquirement of these two languages so universally diffused.

But the requirements keep pace with the increase of acquired knowledge, and the works now in request are such as shall be exact and precise, clear of all vagueness and uncertainty, and conceived in a scientific spirit.

This Dictionary not only contains all the words used by classical writers from the beginning of the seventeenth century to the present time, but also such old words as are necessary to rightly understand certain locutions still in use, and a great number of neologisms to be found in the works of the best authors of our own time and which have become completely incorporated in the language.

This work comprises also the majority of the proper names of persons and places which differ in the two languages, and a considerable number of special terms relating to Sciences, Arts, Commerce and Manufactures, vainly sought for in so many similar works.

A Dictionary offering good definitions illustrated by well chosen examples can alone meet the requirements of the reader and the translator to whom an exact knowledge of the meanings of words is of the utmost importance.

The author has been ably assisted by an eminent professor of English in Paris Mr J. Mc LAUGHLIN, who undertook the translation of the examples and the revision of the whole work.

The pronunciation of each word is figured by a very simple system and as exactly as possible.

That shortcomings may be discovered in this work we have no doubt, the compilers of a dictionary, less than in any other branch of science, can pretend to accuracy, for they have to deal with elements which vary from day to day, and after all, the most devoted efforts of the ablest men cannot expect to attain perfection, the inherent qualities of humanity forbid any such hope. However, should our efforts have facilitated the task of the student, and tended to the spread of a knowledge of the two languages, our most fervent aspirations will have been realised.
